SWING DOORS

Most residential interior doors are hinged to swing into or out of a room. They can be flush, or completely flat, but many feature multiple sculpted square or rectangular panels. Some styles also incorporate glass inserts and unique panel patterns.

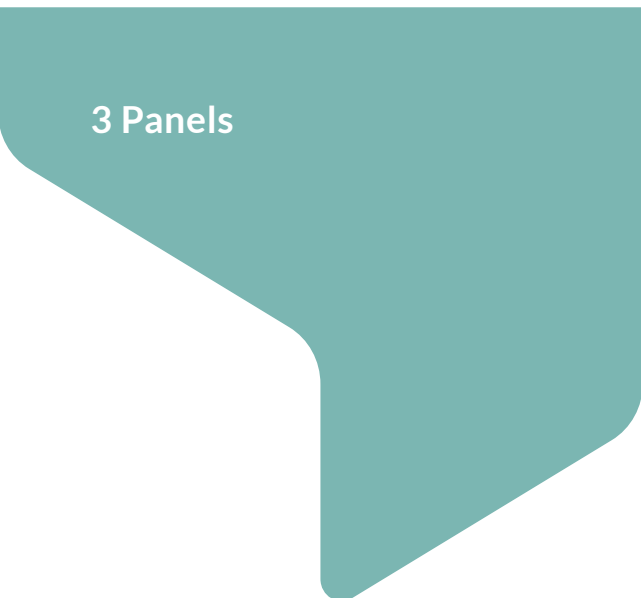

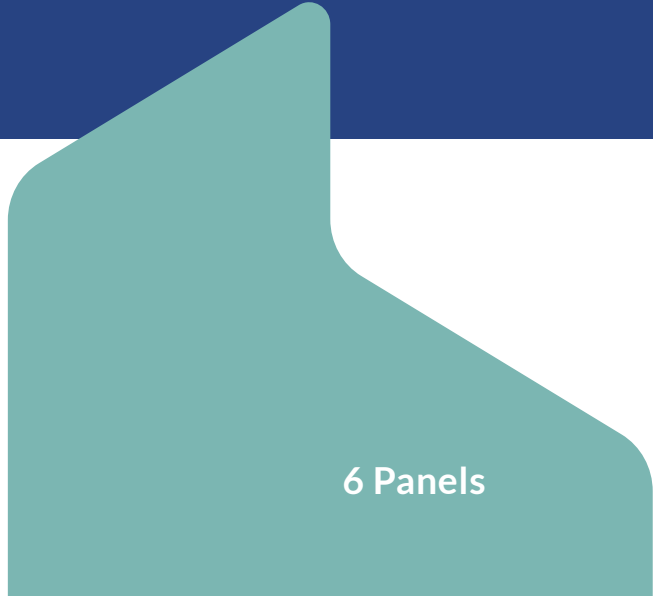

BI-FOLD DOORS

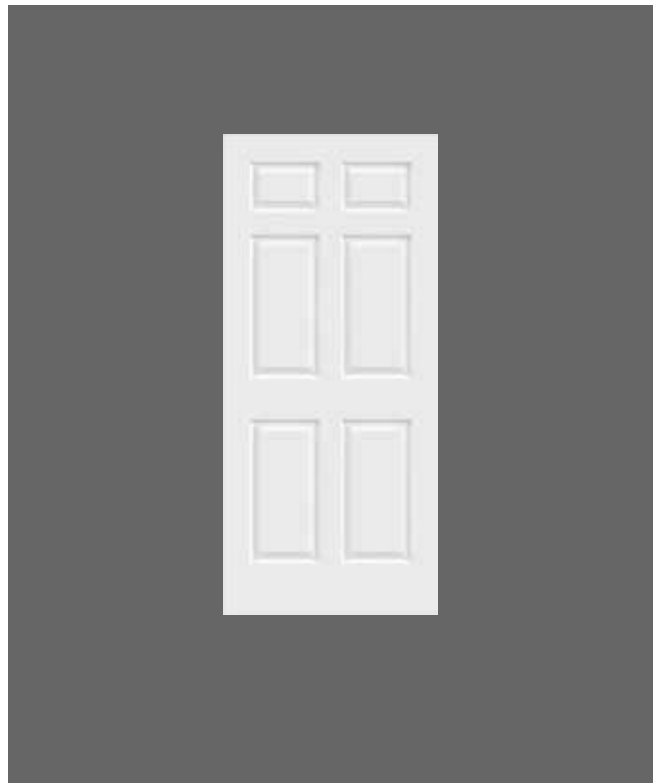

Bi-fold or folding designs are mounted on a track and feature pairs of panels that are hinged to fold together. They're a common choice for bedroom closets, the kitchen pantry, and the laundry room. However, this option also makes sense as a divider between rooms and in areas where a swing-open style won't fit.

BARN DOORS

One of the latest interior trends, barn styles slide along externally mounted decorative rail hardware. Single- and double-panel options are available in rustic, modern, contemporary, and traditional designs. Because they pack a big architectural punch, barn styles are often used as a home décor focal point.

BY-PASS DOORS

Also mounted on a track, by-pass doors are similar to pocket varieties, but they don't slide into the wall—they slide past each other within the room opening. Since this style doesn't swing open, it's useful in areas with limited floor space. However, installation requires a wide entryway, as only part of the opening can be accessed at a time.

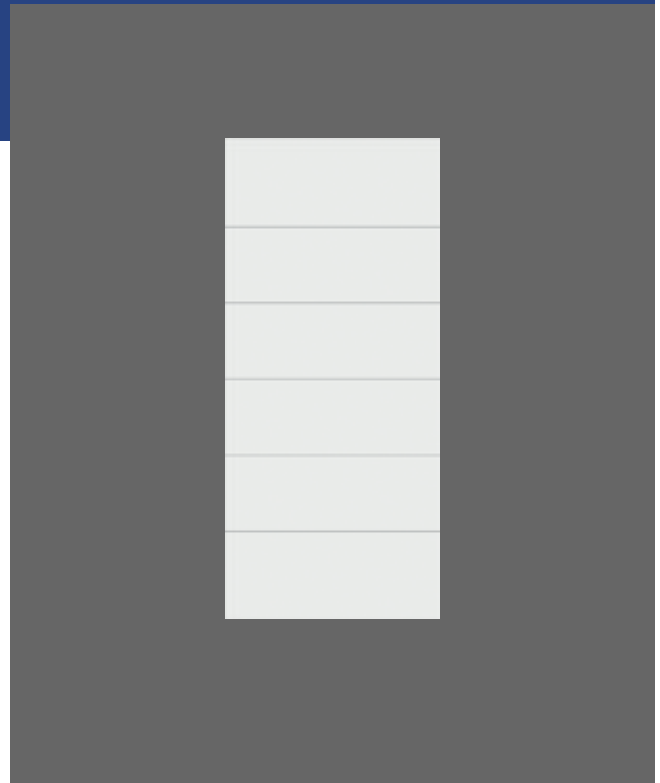

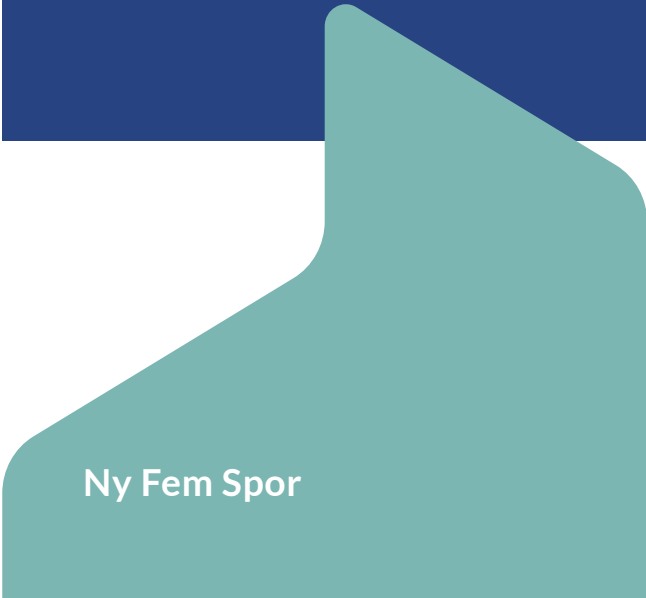

POCKET DOORS

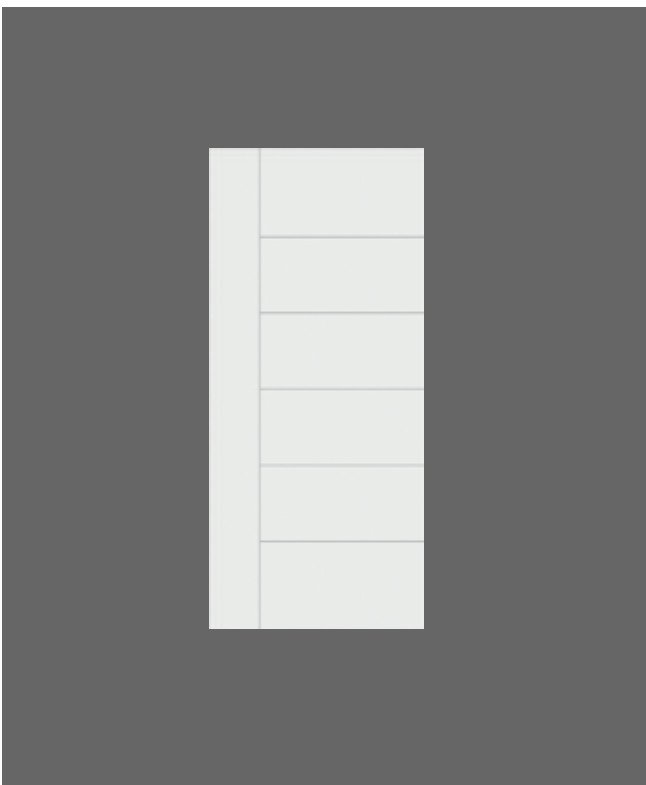

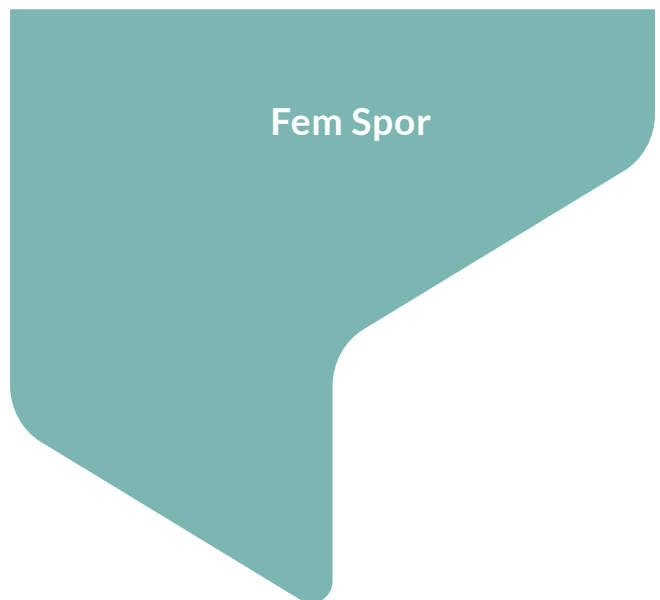

When the available floor space is limited, pocket interior doors are a smart choice. They don't swing open—instead, they slide on an overhead track, disappearing into a compartment within the adjacent wall. Pocket styles can be ideal for bathrooms, closets, and small rooms.
